Effects of distant and local thermal stimuli on the development of taste acuity. The effect of distal heat on the central taste stimulus was investigated in 20 chicks at the ages of 22, 26, 31, and 38 days of age. At all ages, chicks could detect a salt solution concentration of 0.01 M NaCl when the salt solution was placed in the mouth and warmed distally by immersion in water. In addition, chicks could detect, at all ages, a 0.25 M solution of NaCl when warmed distally. The effect of warming the salt solution in the mouth was much stronger than that of warming the salt solution in the mouth and distally. The local temperature was also measured in the tongue region of 24-day-old chicks, and the temperature was as high as 44 degrees C at the tip of the tongue. Chicks were trained to drink a 0.01 M solution of NaCl when they were 44 days old, and the threshold concentration was determined by using 5-log concentration step method. The taste acuity of chicks increased with age and in a manner similar to that reported for animals that were not exposed to heat. These results are interpreted in terms of the response gain hypothesis.FIT FITNESS INDIVIDUALIZATION We adapt our projects to the individual needs and conditions of each athlete. Anaerobic and aerobic bacterial flora in acute bacterial prostatitis. Aerobic and anaerobic bacterial cultures were performed on the discharge of 71 patients with acute bacterial prostatitis (AHP). A different bacterial source was found in 52.4% of cultures of mixed aerobic and anaerobic specimens and 24.1% of the aerobic specimens. Of 78 aerobic isolates, 66 (83.5%) were staphylococci; the commonest genus was coagulase-negative staphylococci (CNS). The anaerobes, included one Streptococcus species, two Peptostreptococcus spp, and 40 non-lactobacilli including eight Bacteroides spp, two Fusobacterium species, one Clostridium species, and 21 unidentified bacteria. Of the AHP patients treated with antibiotics intravenously with or without metronidazole, 14 were cured; of those who received gentamicin or fosfomycin alone, three were cured. Although these antibiotics are effective against anaerobic bacteria, they should be combined with metronidazole or rifampin for acute BHP.Hynothermida Hynothermida is a taxonomic order of sea cucumbers in the family Holothuriidae.
